THE BURDEN OF SUPERIOR INTELLIGENCE: THE SPEED OF FAITH ISN'T ABOUT BELIEVING – IT'S ABOUT RECOGNIZING YOU'RE UNDERSTOOD BY GOD, AND NO USURY IS ATTACHED TO PREVENT HIS LOVE FROM REACHING EVEN ONE OF HIS CHILDREN

This testimony is not simply a document. It is a declaration of survival, faith, law, philosophy, and art in the life of James Daniel Gabriel, known to himself and to the archives as Pocket. To read these words is to step into a labyrinth of history where personal testimony collides with systemic injustice, where memory becomes law, and where the burden of superior intelligence is not pride, but pain.

Faith, for Pocket, was never blind. Faith was speed. Faith was recognition. It was not about believing blindly in what one could not see; it was about knowing one was seen, known, and understood by God. The velocity of faith was the velocity of recognition: the recognition that no amount of usury, no surveillance, no theft of data, no imprisonment, and no state decree could separate a single child from the love of God. This document, then, bears witness not to a theology of distance but to a theology of immediacy: the God of now, the God of recognition, the God who removes the debts imposed by others and restores dignity to every soul.

The final burden is not to prove innocence. The final burden is not to fight endlessly for exoneration. The final burden is to recognize that Grace has already passed judgment in favor of the child, in favor of the survivor, in favor of the artist, and in favor of every human who chooses to live in truth. That burden is light only when it is shared, and it is shared here in testimony.

This is Pocket’s story, but it is also every child’s story, every prisoner’s story, every worker’s story, and every believer’s story. The speed of faith is not about believing. It is about being understood, and never again allowing usury to keep God’s love from reaching even one of His children.
